The foundation's model stands out in the burgeoning big-ticket philanthropy landscape. Aaron Dorfman of the National Committee for Responsive Philanthropy said he knows of no other program like Koch's intensive six-month training designed to coach nonprofit leaders on business principles.

But as president of the philanthropy watchdog group, Dorfman remains skeptical of Koch's intentions. He said supporting private organizations that claim superiority over the way government functions is an affront to the nation's system of taxation and spending. Dorfman, a former community organizer, also is a longtime critic of the Kochs' other tax-exempted advocacy work for advancing their business and political agendas.

"It's hard to be too enthusiastic about one stand-alone initiative. Their influence on our society, on balance, it is for sure mostly bad for poor people," Dorfman said, citing examples such as Koch's efforts to fight environmental regulations and public transit proposals.

McCann says the foundation appreciates the government's role in social services and the Koch grants aren't tied to any political objectives, though there are some overlapping interests with its agenda, such as prison reform and school choice.

She also said Koch's name and reputation have at times preceded Stand Together's budding body of work, and the foundation has had to prove itself to skeptical nonprofit boards in the minority communities it seeks to help.

"We talk about our values of openness and equal rights and toleration, and sometimes you can see people are processing and, you know, confused," McCann said.

Chad Houser, founder and executive chef at Café Momentum, said Stand Together's Catalyst Network training helped his nonprofit outline its vision, which included changes to its governing board. He said the lessons are a refreshing turn not seen in other nonprofit development programs and have given him the freedom and skills to run his restaurant like a business rather than a charity.

"If I never had to go out and beg for money ever again and could just focus on the kids, it would be so amazing," Houser said.

Several other crashes have occurred in recent years involving fewer victims.

Hurst began pushing the legislation more than a decade ago after hearing the story of an infant who was sexually abused by the baby's father.

Early versions of the bill, which did not pass, would have mandated permanent surgical castration.

During the debate, Hurst acknowledged the measure was not a cure-all since it may not work for everyone and offenders could find other ways to molest children.

A spokeswoman for Ivey said Tuesday that the bill is undergoing a legal review before the governor decides whether to sign it.

Some legal groups have questioned the legality of forced medication.

"We certainly think that it raises constitutional concerns," Randall Marshall, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union of Alabama, wrote in an email.

An official at one of the shelter providers said the government notified them on May 30 that they wouldn't be reimbursing costs of providing education and other activities. The providers pay for things like teacher salary upfront and are then reimbursed by the government.

The official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak on the matter, said his employer was scrambling to figure out how it would cover the cost of teachers. The provider hasn't laid anyone off, but worries about children who desperately need to learn English and be intellectually stimulated.
