Gyms

for Disease Control and Prevention guidelines calling for bikes and treadmills to be spaced further apart or unplugged so some can't be used. Equipment is disinfected after each use. Masks are required.

Owners are also installing ventilation equipment to lessen the chances of breathing in concentrated amounts of coronavirus germs. But these procedures don't reassure many people who used to work out several times a week.

Vincent Miceli, owner of Body Blueprint Gym, sees another problem: People have found they can stay in shape without a gym by running, buying their own equipment or taking online workout classes.

"When we reopened, we assumed that about 30% of our members would never come back to a gym because they found something else, and that was pretty accurate," says Miceli, whose gym is in Pelham, New York.

The state of New York is limiting the number of people in a gym to 33% of normal capacity. Before the pandemic, Miceli was running 140 classes a week; now it's 25. His revenue is down 70%.

Jeanne Carter and Julie Bokar also held online classes while their Fuel Training Studio in Newburyport, Massachusetts, was forced to shut. Outdoor classes began in June and were well-attended; but when indoor classes were permitted in July, few clients wanted to be inside.

So, Carter and Bokar keep dragging bikes and other equipment in and out of the gym each day.

"We do a lot of schlepping. You do what you have to do," Carter says.

The owners now plan a greenhouse-like structure that has heaters but no walls that Fuel Training Studio can use into the winter months. Clients have already shown on 40-degree mornings that they're fine with working out in chill air.

"They started with a coat and hat on and within five minutes they were in tank tops," Carter says.

Gyms in California have been particularly hard-hit. They've closed and reopened twice as the number of cases rose and fell and repeated that pattern. Many gyms, including those in Los Angeles and San Francisco, are operating under severe restrictions for indoor workouts. And smoke from nearby wildfires hampered outdoor workouts or forced their cancellation.

Pain

Past research has studied how pain lowers life satisfaction and psychological well-being. But I couldn't find any studies that looked at how pain affects consumer behavior, which is important because, after all, people in pain still need to make decisions about what to buy every day.

I believe that my findings are important for another reason. The pain of paying helps us avoid overspending. "Retail therapy" can be common during tough times like the pandemic, and the plethora of discounts and instant gratification when shopping online can be tempting. My findings suggest that people in physical pain may be more susceptible to surge pricing and other marketing tricks that get people to spend more money. Americans are already holding a lot of credit card debt as it is.

What's next: My colleagues and I have also started looking at how physical pain influences what people choose to eat. We're in the initial stages of the research, but we have early evidence that being in physical pain increases people's willingness to eat more fast food. The reason seems to be the same: We experience guilt when we eat too much junk food, and experiencing physical pain seems to decrease this emotion.

prospects of earning higher wages and sending money back to Venezuela to feed their families.

The new migrants are encountering decidedly more adverse conditions than those who fled their homeland before COVID-19. Shelters remain closed, drivers are more reluctant to pick up hitchhikers and locals who fear contagion are less likely to help out with food donations.

K-Shaped

than six months) joblessness and an increase in those dropping out of the workforce.

In the midst of these challenges, housing values and the stock market have generally escalated and the tech sector has boomed. Consequently, wealth among the upper economic echelons has increased, while unemployment, food insecurity, and poverty have also skyrocketed. It is a recovery that is embracing those at the top, while devastating those at the bottom - a K-shaped recovery. To achieve long-term prosperity, we must keep the structure in place, which requires providing viable opportunities for everyone. This needs to happen soon! Stay safe!
