Struggle

Warren Cohn's relatively mild bout with COVID was complicated by the fact his wife and two children ages 3 years and 3½ months also came down with the virus at the end of March. He had to turn the management of his two marketing firms over to his co-owners.

"If it's just me, I can handle it, but once it turned to my kids, that's when I said, 'I'm dropping everything, you guys have got to handle it,'" says Cohn, co-owner of New York-based HeraldPR and New Orleans-based Emerald Digital.

Cohn kept up with email as best he could but was in bed for two weeks while also caring for his children. Even when he was past the worst of the pain and exhaustion, he needed a daily nap.

A sole proprietor has an even bigger worry: There's no partner to hand off to. When Marisa Vallbona came down with the virus in March, she didn't miss a day of work although she was in bed for weeks and had lingering aftereffects.

"I would never let myself not work," says Vallbona, owner of CIM Inc., a publicity firm based in Houston and San Diego.

At first Vallbona tried to hide her symptoms, even on phone and videoconference calls.

"I was most concerned with how my clients would react to the fact that I was sick and I kept my diagnosis from them until my labored breathing and voice gave it away and I had to tell them," Vallbona says.

She feared having the virus would stigmatize the company and cost her business. But, she says of clients, "they were all extremely kind and supportive."

The experience of being very sick for weeks has made owners more empathic toward their employees. When Dino Selita was forced to care for his family during his month-long illness — his wife and children had the virus too — he got a sense of what his 30 employees might contend with even in the best of times.

"This ultimately has changed my opinion on leniency for our team members. We allow more flexible work schedules," says Selita, co-owner of The Debt Relief Company, a New York-based company that helps consumers manage debt.

Restrictions

New cases per day are soaring, shattering records over and over and reaching an all-time high on Thursday of over 153,000.

With cases rising rapidly in Mississippi, Republican Gov. Tate Reeves said he will not consider a statewide shutdown of businesses.

In the spring, Reeves set a county-by-county mask mandate that was based on case numbers. He issued an executive order that affected just 15 of the state's 82 counties, and eventually imposed a statewide mask mandate that was in effect from Aug. 4 to Sept. 30.

"The people of Mississippi can't just go home, shut down their small businesses, shut down their restaurants, shut down their gyms, shut down other small businesses for six weeks and just think that you can come back six weeks from now, flip a switch and everything is going to be fine," he said. "That's not the way the economy works."

Delivery

It has more than 390,000 merchants in its network.

The announcement came a week after delivery companies scored a major victory in California, where voters passed Proposition 22, which allows app-based delivery companies to treat drivers as contractors instead of employees. Before that passed, they were facing a future where they would have to treat drivers as employees with access to costly benefits such as overtime and sick days. Ride-hailing and delivery companies won an exception, and instead they'll offer limited benefits such health care subsidies to drivers who clock 25 hours per week.

Election

The initial response in the financial markets is quite positive.

I would sum up by noting that the dichotomy created by virtually every poll in the election between the virus and the economy was incorrect. The economy can only be restored through a concerted health response. At the same time, the health response should be examined through the lens of its potential to lead to indirect harms which could be avoided. It will be a balancing act, but research into promising advances in vaccines and therapeutics is ongoing in laboratories and universities across the country and, indeed, the world. Stay safe!
