million global infections and over 850,000 deaths, with the U.S. accounting for more than 6 million infections and 183,000 of the dead. About 68,000 of the U.S. deaths have come since the start of summer, with the number of American infections nearly tripling in the same period.

Texas alone amassed more than 10,000 virus deaths in July and August, Florida added over 7,600, and California recorded nearly 7,000. The Sun Belt also includes Arizona, New Mexico, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Georgia.

Americans head into Labor Day weekend, the unofficial end of summer, knowing the threat isn't gone as fall brings a return to school, college and sports.

"We'll be struggling with COVID. I don't know whether it will surge in the winter, but it certainly will stick around," Shaffner said.

Health experts pinned some of the blame for the summertime surge on Fourth of July parties and other gatherings, and now they worry that Labor Day will contribute to the virus's spread.

The American Hotel and Lodging Association said bookings for Labor Day weekend are down two-thirds from last year.

Next, older residents of nursing homes and other crowded facilities and people of all ages with health conditions that put them at significant danger would be given priority. In following waves of vaccination, teachers, other school staff, workers in essential industries, and people living in homeless shelters, group homes, prisons and other facilities would get the shots.

Healthy children, young adults and everyone else would not get the first vaccinations, but would be able to get them once supplies increase.

The National Academies will solicit public comments on the plan through Friday.

There's a good reason so many COVID-19 vaccines are in development.

"The first vaccines that come out are probably not going to be the best vaccines," Dr. Nicole Lurie, who helped lead pandemic planning under the Obama administration, said at a University of Minnesota vaccine symposium.

There's no guarantee that any of the leading candidates will pan out — and the bar is higher than for COVID-19 treatments, because these vaccines will be given to healthy people. Final testing, experts stress, must be in large numbers of people to know if they're safe enough for mass vaccinations.

They're made in a wide variety of ways, each with pros and cons. One problem: Most of the leading candidates are being tested with two doses, which lengthens the time required to get an answer — and, if one works, to fully vaccinate people.

Another: They're all shots. Vaccine experts are closely watching development of some nasal-spray alternatives that just might begin the first step of human testing later this year — late to the race, but possibly advantageous against a virus that sneaks into the airways.

ted by the Boy Scouts to restrict the ads, saying it was "incredibly broad" and raised concerns about First Amendment issues.

"I need to understand how I can prohibit this type of speech," said the judge. She continued the hearing until Sept. 9 and will accept additional submissions from attorneys through Friday.

with parents facing fines if they refuse to send their kids back. To reduce contact, schools are staggering break times and keeping pupils in "bubbles" with their class.

The World Health Organization acknowledged Monday that while the virus remains a threat, school closures have hurt children's mental health and social development, especially those from low-income families, with disabilities or who are in an abusive home environment.

"We cannot let children become the hidden victims of this pandemic by denying them the opportunities they so fundamentally deserve," WHO Europe said.

Medical experts say the risk of opening schools depends on how widespread COVID-19 infections are in the community and what safety measures are taken. Evidence suggests young children don't spread the disease very easily, while kids aged 10 and up may transmit as much as adults. WHO says children 6-to-11 should wear masks when they cannot social distance, and those 12 and older should wear masks as often as adults.

"Am I scared? Of course," said Alma Alispahic, an elementary school teacher in the Bosnian capital of Sarajevo. "The responsibility is huge, for the school, and for us, as well as for parents."

Unlike the U.S., many European schools reopened partially at the end of the last term. Hand gel dispensers are now a familiar sight to children of any age.
