ment would face the overwhelming response by the South Korea-U.S. military alliance and go on the path of self-destruction, if it attempts to use nuclear weapons," Moon Hong Sik, an acting ministry spokesperson, told reporters.

White House press secretary Karine Jean-Pierre earlier said the United States "remains fully committed to the defense of (South Korea), using the full range of defense capabilities." Jean-Pierre said the United States has no hostile intent toward North Korea and that it remains focused on pursuing close coordination with its allies to advance a shared objective of the complete denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula.

Last week, North Korea's rubber-stamp parliament adopted the legislation on the rules for the use of its nuclear arsenal. It would allow the use of nuclear weapons if its leadership faced an imminent attack or if it aims to prevent an unspecified "catastrophic crisis" to its people.

The loose wording raised concerns the rules are largely meant as a legal basis for a preemptive nuclear strike to intimidate rivals into making concessions amid long-stalled negotiations over its arsenal. Some experts say the North Korean move is also designed to strengthen the control of Kim Jong Un's leadership in the face of hardships caused by the pandemic and border closures.

During the parliament's meeting, Kim said in a speech that his country will never abandon its nuclear weapons to cope with U.S. threats. He accused the United States of pushing to weaken the North's defenses and eventually collapse his government.

Earlier this year, Kim said his nuclear weapons would never be confined to the sole mission of war deterrent and could be used preemptively if his country's national interests are threatened. North Korea later approved plans to assign new duties to front-line army units, sparking speculation it was a step toward deploying battlefield nuclear weapons along its border with South Korea.

2030," Gates, 66, said in an interview with The Associated Press. He added, though, "I'm optimistic that we can get back on track."

Gates pointed to the war in Ukraine and the pandemic as the main causes for the worsening hunger crisis. But his message to other donors and world leaders convening for the U.N. General Assembly this September is that food aid won't be enough.

"It's good that people want to prevent their fellow human beings from starving when conflicts like Ukraine interrupt the food supply," Gates writes in the new report. But the real problem, he says, is that many food insecure countries don't produce enough of their own food — a problem sure to be exacerbated by the consequences of climate change.

"Temperature keeps going up," Gates said. "There is no way, without innovation, to come even close to feeding Africa. I mean, it just doesn't work."

As he has for more than 15 years, Gates called for investment in agricultural research, highlighting corn seeds that thrive at higher temperatures and in drier conditions than other varieties. Those seeds were developed under a program of the African Agricultural Technology Foundation to which the foundation has given $131 million since 2008.

Jones said he and his business partner, Andy Phelan, have already met with the Department of Marine Resources, the Army Corps of Engineers and others to devise the proposal which would cost an estimated $22 million.

Supervisor Beverly Martin said during the presentation "$22 million for one mile — I love the idea, but it's just expensive."

Jones identified several potential sources of funding for planning and building the lagoon including GOMESA funds that come to South Mississippi from offshore oil contracts and BP Restore Act funds that were to be dedicated to "transformational" projects on the coast. Supervisor Marlin Ladner said the only feasible way to pay for such a project would likely be to dedicate funds annually to repay a bond.

Supervisor Connie Rockco said she and Martin next week will attend the Gulf States Counties and Parishes Caucus in Corpus Christi, Texas, to present details of the proposal to see if there is interest.
