The National Ocean Industries Association, which represents offshore energy companies, said, "Communities along the Gulf Coast and throughout the country rely upon Gulf of Mexico oil and gas development for good-paying jobs, affordable energy supplies, and important funding for local infrastructure needs, coastal restoration and resiliency, and parks and recreation programs."

The previous lease sale, in November 2020, had brought $120.9 million in high bids on 93 tracts. Seven of those bids, totaling $9.3 million, were rejected as too low.

In a separate action, the Center for Biological Diversity asked the Environmental Protection Agency on Wednesday to forbid companies to discharge fracking waste into the ocean.

It said trade secret protections in current rules for permits governing oil industry discharges into the Gulf of Mexico mean EPA "often does not know what chemicals are used."

As of 2016, it said, EPA had identified nearly 1,100 chemicals used in hydraulic fracturing and more than 500 found in water that comes up with oil and gas. The agency "has little to no information regarding the impacts of many of these chemicals on human and marine environments," it said.

A proposed new permit for the western Gulf of Mexico "would allow more of the same," the organization said in public comments about a two-year industry study to assess discharges.

The climate bill's requirement for offshore lease sales is likely to increase offshore drilling and fracking, the group said.

"With offshore drilling set to surge, the Biden administration needs to stop oil and gas companies from poisoning the Gulf of Mexico with fracking waste," Kristin Carden, a senior scientist at the Center, said in a news release.

National Ocean Industries Association President Erik Milito responded, "This is a complete misunderstanding of offshore production processes and does not reflect the actual science and engineering behind how U.S. offshore oil and gas is actually produced. Performance-based limits provide strict controls on the fluids that are discharged and ensure a sound, risk-based approach to protecting the environment."
