events as a deadly and premeditated assault by the soldiers on a white population. Historians and advocates say the soldiers responded to what was thought to be a white mob heading for them.

Out of 118 soldiers, 110 were found guilty in the largest murder trial in U.S. history. Nineteen of them were hanged.

According to the Army's statement, the first executions happened secretly a day after sentencing. It led to immediate regulatory changes prohibiting future executions without review by the War Department and the president.

Families of the soldiers may be entitled to benefits and can apply through a U.S. Army Board for Correction of Military Records.

"Today is a day I believed would happen," Jason Holt, a descendant in attendance at the ceremony, said, according to the Houston Chronicle. "I always did."

test demonstrations.

Demonstrators in Austin invoked Ramos' name when they took to the streets to protest the killing of George Floyd by Minneapolis police the following month.

Taylor and another officer face murder charges in connection with a 2019 death of a man who was experiencing a mental health crisis when he was shot and killed. Taylor's attorneys said in a 2021 statement that he had no choice but to use deadly force to protect himself.

Fracking

doing this in our parks," Cowan Becker said. "We're rightfully really angry about this."

The decision is the first of its kind in Ohio, although laws allowing fracking have been on the books since 2011.

Legislation under then-Gov. John Kasich, a former Republican presidential candidate, called for a state board to allow state-owned land to be "leased for the exploration for and development and production of oil or natural gas."

But the formation of the commission was not formalized during the Kasich administration. In fact, its first meeting did not occur until December of 2022, after current GOP Gov. Mike DeWine signed a bill similar to the 2011 legislation.

Commission chair Ryan Richardson emphasized in a previous commission meeting that according to the language in the nominated leases, no surface areas of the parks would be disturbed by oil and gas drilling as it would occur underground.

However, most of the meeting Wednesday was nearly impossible to hear over the boos and chants of environmental advocates in the room.

A spokesperson for Richardson said she would respond to reporters' questions later Wednesday.

Oil and gas fracking is often a polarizing topic, but ongoing accusations of fraudulent support have added even more tension to the vote.

A Cleveland.com investigation in September found that over a hundred Ohio residents said their names were attached to form letters sent to the commission in a public comment period without their knowledge — all of them urging state parks allow fracking.

Those names included a 9-year-old girl and a blind woman. The form letter, which appears over 1,000 times in the public comment database, urges Ohio to "responsibly" lease rights to minerals under Salt Fork State Park, among other areas.

The 9-year-old's mother, Brittany Keep, told Cleveland.com that her daughter knows nothing about oil and gas exploration and neither of them have visited Salt Fork State Park.

The letters could be traced back to multiple pro-oil entities, including Consumer Energy Alliance, a Texas-based pro-oil and gas organization. The energy alliance has denied collecting names without permission and has called Cleveland.com's coverage "libelous." The nonprofit collects and verifies those names and other demographic data through a third party, according to the group's spokesperson, Bryson Hull.

physical evidence. The case is pending.

For years, Texas' youth prison system has been plagued by a series of scandals over child abuse that have been driven by cycles of stark understaffing.

In 2021, the U.S. Department of Justice opened a statewide civil rights investigation into the conditions in five of the systems' facilities and whether they provide adequate mental health care and protection from violence for the incarcerated young people. The probe remains ongoing.
