voting laws will also come before the justices this term.

One measure requires people to show proof of citizenship when registering to vote using a state form, and another calls for regular purges of the voter rolls to remove people if their citizenship could not be confirmed.

It comes as Trump has failed to get legislation requiring documentary proof of citizenship for registering to vote through Congress. Arguments are set for December.

Religious rights

Catholic preschools that can't take part in a taxpayer-funded program in Colorado will come before the court in November. It's the justices' latest case involving religious rights.

St. Mary Catholic Parish says it's been left out of the state's universal preschool program over its faith-based admissions policies, which exclude kids from LGBTQ+ families.

Colorado says religious schools are welcome to participate but have to follow nondiscrimination laws. The program was created by a 2020 ballot measure and provides public funding for preschool at schools selected by parents.

Taiwan's Presidential Office confirmed President Lai Ching-te's relatives were the targets, without specifying if it was the president's son, saying that "this is a classic case of transnational repression."

"Taiwan condemns in the strongest terms such barbaric acts — which disregard human rights and national sovereignty and aim to suppress, threaten, or even harm individuals advocating for freedom and democracy or their families — as such behavior should not be tolerated in the civilized world," spokesperson Karen Kuo said in a statement.

The criminal complaint does not name the alleged target, but the FBI's rapid response account on the social media platform X said it was the president's son. Ting-Yu Lai, the president's elder son, lives and works in the Seattle area as an engineer.

Book bans

report arrives during "Banned Books Week," during which events at schools and libraries and other locations nationwide call attention to censorship efforts.

King's books were pulled 312 times, with "The Shining" and "The Green Mile" among those impacted. Meanwhile, the most banned individual title was Patrick McCormick's novel about a girl sold into sexual slavery in India, "Sold," for which PEN found 25 removals. Other books commonly targeted include Margaret Atwood's dystopian "The Handmaid's Tale"; Laurie Halse Anderson's "Speak," her prize-winning novel about a teenager who falls silent after being raped; and Ellen Hopkins' novel about drug addiction, "Crank."

PEN America and the American Library Association have both reported historic surges in bans since the early 2020s, although their methodologies differ. PEN counts books removed even for a short time as a ban, while the ALA only includes books that have been permanently pulled. According to the library association's most recent report, published in April, some 5,600 instances of bans took place during the previous year.

ated Press. He used what he calls "a trick from nature," putting the gene that controls that microbial protein into certain cells in the brains of living mice.

Beaming light at those cells — first by using tiny fibers, now with noninvasive methods — can turn neurons on or off while animals do various tasks.

"People usually think about light as a way of collecting information to observe things," he told the AP. "But this is the opposite of that. This is using light to control things, to make things happen, and to do it in a very precise way."

Optogenetics is mostly a research tool to learn how specific neurons and neural circuits work.

That "gives you, inevitably, ideas for how to correct things that go wrong," Deisseroth said. "Once you know the cells that are causal, that actually matter for a symptom or for correcting a symptom, you can devise medications or other methods that target those cells."
