receiving paperwork in July seeking permission to survey their property, along with a map showing where the project would run behind their house on property stretching to the Rio Grande.

The couple arrived 25 years ago and raised four children there. Now retired, they worry construction could worsen flooding and leave 15 acres (6 hectares) of their land behind the wall.

"We're going to let them take us to court, do eminent domain and we'll fight it that way," Dianna said.

CBP has reached agreements with dozens of Big Bend landowners but the administration has also hired eminent domain attorneys in Texas in anticipation of disputes, said a Justice Department official speaking on condition of anonymity under ground rules set by the government.

In a win for opponents, a federal judge recently temporarily barred wall construction in the Big Bend area. Plaintiffs argued the administration overstepped its authority to bypass regulations.

It's not immediately clear how long the judge's order will slow the government, which late Thursday asked the judge to put aside her decision while they appeal.

barreled rifle, short-barreled shotgun and other certain other firearms must fall after the Republican-controlled Congress and President Donald Trump eliminated a $200 permit tax on the devices. The Justice Department opted not to appeal the judge's decision.

Groups that support gun restrictions decried the judge's ruling and the Justice Department's decision to let it stand as reckless and argued that the regulations are important for public safety.

In an interview with The Associated Press on Friday, Cekada said that after the judge's ruling, federal law enforcement was inundated with questions from the public and members of Congress about how they were going to handle enforcement nationwide. The Trump administration believed that the "best and fairest thing to do" was to address the rules nationwide to avoid a confusing patchwork of regulations across the country, Cekada said.

Under the new guidance, ATF will no longer require registration unless the buyer lives in one of about 15 states that have state laws requiring that people go through the federal permitting process. The registration process will still apply for machine guns and what are considered "destructive devices" under federal law, the Justice Department said.

And in all cases, people will still have to fill out the standard firearms purchasing form, which includes questions about things that would disqualify someone from legal gun ownership, and they also have to pass a background check, officials said.

Public executions

"Therefore I apologize and I'm ready to go. Goodbye, goodbye."

The crowd reportedly responded: "Goodbye Cy, goodbye Cy."

"This is in the days before TV, so not much going on often in big cities, certainly in rural areas, too, so they were there just for the spectacle," Radelet said, adding that sometimes it would draw a crowd because the person was so hated.

Thousands watched country's last public execution

The 1936 hanging in Kentucky of Rainey Bethea is often considered the last public execution in the country, said Radelet.

Bethea was a Black man who reportedly confessed to the rape and killing of a 70-year-old white woman, but was never charged with murder, according to the Death Penalty Information Center. Thousands of people attended the event, which was held in a parking lot so the courthouse lawn wouldn't be damaged by the crowd, according to the center.

through channels such as taxable retail sales, hotel occupancy taxes, and higher property values. We estimate that the increase in economic activity associated with private defense companies generates annual tax revenue of almost $1.8 billion to the State of Texas and $1.5 billion to local entities in the North Texas region.

Beyond its invaluable role in providing resources which are critical to our national security, the private-sector defense industry generates jobs for individuals and opportunities for other local businesses not only in North Texas, but in cities across the state. The sector is poised to remain a vital source of economic activity for decades to come, adding to the substantial economic benefits of military bases and related operations around the state. Stay safe!
