ally to the president. Paxton, however, claimed he was more aligned with Trump's Make America Great Again movement, pulling away support that may have otherwise gone to Cornyn.

Trump didn't endorse either candidate during the primary, but the results may raise pressure on him to take a side. Republicans in Washington have expressed concern that Paxton, who has well-documented political baggage, may be a weaker candidate in the general election.

Regardless of what happens, expect more cash to be pumped into the race. Cornyn and well-funded allied groups spent at least $64 million in television advertising alone since July.

While the race goes on, one person will be missing: Wesley Hunt. The congressman was a late entry into what had been a head-on contest between Cornyn and Paxton. His presence in the race further divided Republicans, making the runoff harder to avoid.

The first elections of the year weren't entirely smooth sailing

In two major Texas counties — Dallas and Williamson — there was significant confusion over where voters could cast their ballot. For years, they could vote anywhere in the county. But for this primary, the local Republican parties opted against countywide voting.

With state law mandating that both parties have to agree to use the countywide system, voters could only vote at their assigned precinct — forcing many to figure out where exactly that was.

Things quickly turned messy, with lawsuits, changes to voting hours and Democrats calling foul. Crockett called the rule change an "effort to suppress the vote." Talarico's campaign said it was "deeply concerned."

Political parties run their own primaries in Texas, meaning a repeat of Tuesday's confusion is unlikely to repeat in November.

But this isn't happening in a vacuum. Texas is central to Trump's redistricting effort to protect Republicans' narrow majority in the House.

The party has also pushed legislation that would impose strict new proof-of-citizenship requirements. The bill is a long shot in the Senate but serves as another reminder of Republican efforts to change election rules heading into November.

In addition, any raw feelings could complicate Democrats' chances later this year. Crockett's campaign has said she'll sue over voting problems, and her accusations of voter suppression are important in a state where Black voters are central to any Democratic candidate's success.

If Talarico has a shot, he will likely need Crockett's help in encouraging her disappointed supporters to back him.

in January. The trial was delayed after the presiding judge was removed from the case. A new date has not been set. Spencer has pleaded not guilty.

Court documents show that on the night of the October 2024 shooting, Spencer woke up to find his daughter missing from her bedroom and went searching for her in his truck. He found the girl in the passenger seat of a vehicle Fosler was driving. Spencer forced Fosler's truck off the highway and, after an altercation, called 911 to report he had shot the man, records show.

Spencer pledged in a Facebook post last month that if elected he would establish a dedicated team to combat sex crimes against children.

a request for comment. The Defense Department declined to comment on whether it is still using Claude, including in the Iran war, citing operational security.

Cummings published a paper at a top AI conference in December arguing that government agencies should prohibit the use of generative AI "to control, direct, guide or govern any weapon." Not because AI is so smart that it could go rogue, but because the large language models behind chatbots like Claude make too many mistakes — called hallucinations or confabulations — and are "inherently unreliable and not appropriate in environments that could result in the loss of life."

"You're going to kill noncombatants," Cummings said in an interview Tuesday with The Associated Press. "You're going to kill your own troops. I'm not clear whether the military truly understands the limitations."
