Exxon and Chevron are among the big drillers reporting earnings this week. On Tuesday BP said that its first-quarter profit more than doubled.

The oil companies' results come at a time when gasoline prices in the U.S. hit new multiyear highs, a point of increasing agitation for travelers, households and also businesses that are particularly sensitive to higher energy prices.

The average price of gasoline in the U.S. hit $4.39 on Friday, according to motor club AAA. up more than 8% this week.

Inflation in the U.S. rose sharply last month during largest monthly jump in gas prices in six decades, according to data from the U.S. Department of Labor. The surge in gas prices has squeezed the budgets of lower- and middle-income families, making it more difficult to pay for necessities.

But it's disrupting businesses as well, particularly those sensitive to higher fuel costs. Airlines worldwide have begun canceling flights as the war in the Middle East strains jet fuel supplies and pushes up ticket prices.

Iran internet

told a local newspaper. About 10 million people have jobs that depend on internet connectivity, according to the communications minister, Sattar Hashemi.

An unprecedented shutdown guts an online economy

Throughout years of economic turmoil in Iran brought on by sanctions and mismanagement, platforms like Instagram and WhatsApp helped small businesses to find customers, and people to earn extra income to afford skyrocketing prices for basic goods.

Iranian authorities first shut down the internet in January during mass anti-government protests. That cutoff was just starting to ease when the government imposed a complete internet blackout on Feb. 28 as the U.S. and Israel launched the war.

Mahsa Alimardani, an expert on internet censorship, said Kashmir and Myanmar have had longer blocks affecting specific regions or platforms. Countries like China, with its "Great Firewall," and North Korea, have always strictly limited access to the global internet.

"What makes Iran's shutdown unprecedented is the combination of scale and severity: an entire country of 90 million people with a developed digital economy deliberately reverted to a controlled national intranet," said Alimardani, an associate director for technology threats and opportunities at the rights group Witness.

A flagship company of Iran's digital economy, online retailer DigiKala, recently said it was laying off 200 people, about 3% of its workforce. The pain extends to "production, foreign trade and even traditional business," Reza Olfatnasab, head of a national group representing digital businesses, said in comments published in Iranian media.

Khademi's shopfront is Instagram. But her studio's page — with more than 30,000 followers — is now inactive. She was doing the photo shoot to save the pictures for later, hoping to find an alternative.

Her model, Farnaz Ojaghloo, is also a fitness coach. The shutdown has dried up both her modeling gigs and the online courses she ran for people inside Iran and abroad.

"Psychologically, it really hits hard," Ojaghloo said. "All the plans you had for six months or a year ahead get pushed aside, and your only concern becomes surviving in the moment."

Cartel cracks

market share and possibly encourage other countries to reevaluate their positions.

If multiple countries leave, it may become difficult for the cartel to be sustainable. Without quotas, there would often be incentives to pump as much oil as possible, likely causing prices to fall. There could even be a price war, where major producers try to drive others out of business. Over a longer horizon, prices might be set by the market alone, with cycles and instability becoming more common.

Even in the unlikely scenario in which OPEC totally collapses, major players are likely to continue to (at least implicitly) work together due to the mutual benefits of cooperation. However, there are cracks in the cartel, and it will be interesting to see if anything breaks. Stay safe!
