Withholding pay

The Constitution stipulates that lawmakers must be paid so they have received salaries during shutdowns even as federal workers went without paychecks. When the full government shutdown began in October amid a dispute over health care subsidies, Sen. Lindsey Graham proposed a constitutional amendment to require members to forfeit their paychecks when the government is closed.

"If members of Congress had to forfeit their pay during government shutdowns, there would be fewer shutdowns and they would end quicker," Graham, R-S.C., said at the time.

Graham said his legislation was the most "constitutionally sound" way to deal with the problem, but the process would have been much more laborious as three-fourths of states must ratify an amendment.

Lawmakers in previous shutdowns have often pledged to forgo their paychecks while federal workers went unpaid. Senators earn an annual salary of $174,000, but many are independently wealthy.

Kennedy told reporters Wednesday that he pushed his measure to ensure there is "shared sacrifice" during shutdowns. He added that it does not go as far as he would like, but that it's a start.

Asked why it does not extend to the other chamber of Congress, Kennedy said "the House's business is the House's business" while also touching on the tensions between the Senate and House.

"There's a very strong undercurrent of animosity among some of my friends in the House," Kennedy said.

"It's quickly becoming like two kids fighting in the back of a minivan," he said.

tors have alleged was a murder-for-hire scheme.

The Supreme Court ruled last year that prosecutors' decision to allow a key witness to give testimony they knew to be false violated Glossip's constitutional right to a fair trial.

Glossip has remained behind bars after Oklahoma Attorney General Gentner Drummond announced the state would seek to retry him on a murder charge but not pursue the death penalty again.

"The court fully expects that the state will rigorously prosecute its case going forward and the defense will provide robust representation for Glossip," the judge wrote in the order. "The court hopes that a new trial, free of error, will provided all interested parties and the citizens of Oklahoma, the closure they deserve."

During his time on death row, courts in Oklahoma set nine different execution dates for Glossip, and he came so close to being put to death that he ate three separate last meals. In 2015, he was even held in a cell next to Oklahoma's execution chamber, waiting to be strapped to a gurney and die by lethal injection.

But the scheduled time for his execution came and went. Behind the walls of the Oklahoma State Penitentiary, prison officials were scrambling after learning one of the lethal drugs they received to carry out the procedure didn't match the execution protocols. The drug mix-up ultimately led to a nearly seven-year moratorium on executions in Oklahoma.

"Mr. Glossip now has the chance to taste freedom while his defense team continues to pursue justice on his behalf against a system that the United States Supreme Court has found to be guilty of serious misconduct by state prosecutors," Knight said.

Van Treese's family had asked the Supreme Court to leave Glossip's conviction and sentence intact. Attorneys for the family did not immediately respond to requests for comment.

nition. This generally means muzzleloaders that use black powder or a black powder substitute, though some early cartridge guns are included.

You can even own and fire a cannon.

Don't go off half cocked

Most states have adopted that language either verbatim or by direct reference to the federal provision. But, as military historian Patrick Luther says, "it's a patchwork."

"I live in NY (New York) and bought a civil war musket," Luther, a Marine veteran with the website milsurpia.com, said in an email. "It was very similar to buying a regular firearm. Buying the blackpowder for the rifle felt not much different than buying a T-shirt."

At least three states — Hawaii, Ohio and North Dakota — treat a smoothbore musket the same as an AK-47 or AR-15. Reenactor Jason Monhollen, an officer in the U.S. Army, says that's "comparing apples and oranges."

"It seems silly to put restriction on something that would be such a terrible weapon if you wanted to, you know, kill people," says Monhollen, who portrays a private and carries a French Charleville musket in the 2nd North Carolina Regiment. "There's just much better things. You can kill more people quickly with a car than you can with a musket."
